Baltimore Bend Conservation Area

About This Area

Baltimore Bend Conservation Area is in northeastern Lafayette County, between the towns of Dover and Waverly. The area is situated on the forest hills overlooking the Missouri River. It can be reached via Highway 24, which forms a part of the area's southern boundary, via Baltimore Bend Road on the east, or via Brown School Road on the west.

The area has a rich history. The Lewis and Clark Expedition of the early 1800s passed Baltimore Bend on the Missouri River, and the area was the focal point of much of the river's early boat traffic.

The river boat "Baltimore" found its final resting place against an island in the bend of the river, giving rise to the names of Baltimore Island and Baltimore Bend.

The Conservation Department began acquiring land for Baltimore Bend Conservation Area in 1986. The area presently consists of 1,202 acres. The north half of the area consists of steep, wooded slopes with narrow ridges. The south half is less steep and its ridges and drainages are broad and flat. Most of the open fields are found in the southern portion on the area.

About 80 percent of the area is forested. Primary species include oak, hickory, basswood, and black walnut. Native warm-season grasses (52 acres) and grain crops (80 acres) provide food and cover for wildlife.

The area is managed for a wide variety of game and non-game wildlife. Deer, turkey, and squirrels are abundant. Grain crops, native grasses, tree plantings, timber harvesting, and timber stand improvement thinning help create additional habitat for quail, dove, rabbit, and other species.

In 2002, the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service began acquiring Baltimore Bottom Unit, which is managed as part of Big Muddy National Fish and Wildlife Refuge. Refuge operations differ from those at Baltimore Bend Conservation Area, so check with the refuge manager and the US Fish and Wildlife Service information bulletin board located at the north parking lot by the railroad for details. Baltimore Bottom Unit is open for fishing and hunting under statewide regulations. The unit is closed to motor vehicles, ATVs, horses and bicycles.
